Kichatna Mountains (Unit 85)

Snow and ice, bare ground, dwarf shrub, and alder. In addition to the striking scenery, this unit contains Fourth of July Creek, a pristine salmon spawning stream that includes a wide diversity of habitat in its watershed. Swan nesting sites in southeastern part of unit. There are two cabins.

This region receives little human use. The Kichatna Spires have a reputation world-wide in the climbing community. Horse use in the southwest corner of the unit has occurred. The general vicinity of the landing area on the Cul-de-Sac glacier is designated as a portal zone. Wilderness character is excellent: Diminished during hunting season, during subsistence use, and during periods of frequent overflights.
